From night bird on the prowl.
His cry is mellow.

A school for Robots

There was once a school without a single living student; the principal got his students from a robot factory instead. He boasted that these robots were quite perfect and never missed a chance to show how easy it was to make them learn. Simply by pressing a row of buttons on their shoulders, beneath their sweaters, one could make them do exactly what was needed.

You can understand why in a school which wanted discipline and order all the time, these little robots would be far more convenient than real students. One teacher was enough for everyone. Each morning all that had to be done was to press the right buttons and the rest would follow automatically. So these little robots were indeed very efficient, and everyone who saw them working was stunned by their performance.

At 8.25, at the sound of the first bell, they would enter the classroom. At 8.30, at the sound of the second bell they would begin to write down their arithmetic problems, or start their compositions. At 9.30, they would all hand in their papers. At 9.35, they would all recite history in exactly the same way. At 10.15, they took their lunch trays and they ate. At 10.20, they all repeated the same rule of grammar together, they did their Mathematics and recited Geography from textbooks. At 12.45 they packed their school bags and at 12.50, they said goodbye to the teacher and left.

One morning a new robot came to school, looking exactly like the rest. However, at 8.30, at the sound of the second bell when it was time for them to be seated, the new comer dawdled a bit just enough to surprise the teacher. At 9.35, during History lesson the new robot recited something different. The teacher was so dumfounded that she went to examine the robot's button at once. They were all in order. Then teacher phoned frantically the factory to send a mechanic at once.

When he arrived, he checked all the buttons and said everything was in order, he could find nothing to do except to tighten some screws. But again when others were reciting numbers in order, the new comer said "seven, five, three, ten..." and then during Geography lesson the robot started questioning.

The Principal heard all the commotion and came running. The teacher had to explain. The Principal turned to the repairman, and said 'if buttons were alright, have a look inside'

So the repairman quickly took his screws and unfastened the cover and take of the top part. He just stood there with his eyes wide open. There inside instead of the spools of magnetic tapes that the other robots had, was a little girl and she was just looking at them and laughing.
